The Washington Free Beacon, owned by the conservative website the American Enterprise Institute, ran a story in 2012 about the State Department's decision to spend $500,000 on a Holocaust memorial website. The story said that the State Department's Office of Global Affairs and U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum created the site to educate Americans about the Holocaust. According to the story, "the site includes narratives, teaching materials, and other Holocaust education resources." But a 2014 report by the Department of State inspector general found that Washington Free Beacon reporter Matthew Boyle fabricated key elements of that 2012 story. The report, however, did not find that Boyle made any of the specific claims about the Holocaust memorial website that he made in the 2012 story. In 2015, the State Department updated the Holocaust website. Despite this, the 2011 Free Beacon story remains available on its website. A review of Google showed that The State Department at one point linked to the 2012 Free Beacon story from its main page. Google Cache can indicate when a link is being viewed on a website that you have not visited yet. For instance, when you go to a specific page on a website, you might view a cached version of the webpage. But if you changed the URL of the page that you are going to, you would not see the cached version of the page. If you are seeing this cached version, you would have gone to the page and then you would have changed the URL and would not have seen the cached page. However, when you go to the same page after several hours, you would see the cached version. This way, if someone tries to edit the cached version of the page, it will not appear on the website. When we found the cached version of the page, we also found out that the URL pointed to the 2012 Free Beacon story. In September 2015, the State Department replaced the previously cached version with a new cached version. But we still found the 2012
