In a computer system, virtual machine (VM) failure is a result of loss of network connectivity or some hardware failure. Without some form of network connectivity, a host or server machine hosting the VM cannot provision the VM with network connectivity information. Often, a host machine may maintain a migration of the VM to a different host machine in the event of the failure of the VM. FIG. 1 shows a conventional system where host machine 100 hosts virtual machine (VM) 101. Host machine 100 includes host management software 102 that manages and provisions VM 101 for network connectivity. Host machine 100 sends VM 101 network connectivity information such as IP address, a private IP address, a shared IP address, the domain name server (DNS) URL, and so on to enable VM 101 to access network 103. In the event of network connectivity failure, host machine 100 migrates VM 101 to another host machine 110 by transferring the network connectivity information of VM 101 to another host machine 110, where the host machine is connected to network 103. Host machine 110 may be an administrative host machine, such as a Domain Network Operation Center (DNOC) machine, or a cloud server. FIG. 2 shows a conventional system where VM 201 is hosted by host machine 200. Host machine 200 includes host management software 202 that manages and provisions VM 201 for network connectivity. Host machine 200 sends VM 201 network connectivity information such as IP address, a private IP address, a shared IP address, the DNS URL, and so on to enable VM 201 to access network 203. In the event of network connectivity failure, host machine 200 migrates VM 201 to another host machine 210 by transferring the network connectivity information of VM 201 to another host machine 210, where the host machine is connected to network 203. Host machine 210 may be an administrative host machine, such as a DNOC machine, or a cloud server. In the conventional system, VM migrations are performed manually by a user or operator of the host machine that serves as the final destination of the VM. The process is time consuming and cumbersome. More importantly, there is no automation in the conventional system to proactively migrate VMs. There is thus a need for addressing these and/or other issues associated with the prior art.
